KNOWLEDGE SPACES / SPACES OF KNOWLEDGE

At the beginning of the 21st century, the ways in which we understand, produce and communicate knowledge are undergoing fundamental changes. This studio addresses the ways in which spatial organisation reflects these changes that are inextricably linked to technological innovation and challenges the way in which spatial practices relate to the production of knowledge. Five architectural typologies, the library, the research institute, the laboratory, the museum, and the design school, are moving toward a transgression of typological boundaries and towards performative conditions of living and working.

This design studio challenges the technological, cultural and social aspects that are innately related to the localisation of knowledge production, communication and dissemination.
